STEAM

Dive into a full-day summer camp where kids embrace nature journaling at the Taylor Creek wetlands. Campers will investigate, through hands-on experiments, how living and nonliving components—such as plants, animals, water, and soil—interact to filter water, support diverse species, and shape the ecosystem. Factual illustrations allow campers to be curious, observe and use art to record and analyze the uniqueness and diversity of the wetlands' flora and fauna. Adding art is important to a nature journal entry because it allows for a deeper, more personal connection to the natural world by visually capturing details, textures, colors, and unique characteristics of nature that might be difficult to fully describe with words alone; essentially enhancing the observation and recording process.

Each session's warm-up kicks off with footwork exercises to improve foot speed and comfort with the ball. Warm-ups will also focus on some of the dozens of ball moves that we teach at Coerver®. Using those moves becomes a major component in the rest of the session. Different games will be used to isolate specific elements of 1v1 play.
